NATIONAL FEDERATION OF PRESS WOMEN
ANNOUNCES NEW OFFICERS

ARLINGTON, VA. -- Journalist Meg Hunt of Taylors, S.C., has been elected president of the National Federation of Press Women (NFPW), an organization of professional journalists and communicators.

Hunt, who began her two-year term in September, is the former special editions coordinator for the Spartanburg Herald-Journal, Spartanburg, S.C. She just completed a term as NFPW first vice president and also has served as director of the communications contest, publications and hospitality, and as Southeast Quadrant director for the NFPW Education Fund Board. Active in her NFPW state affiliate, Media Women of South Carolina, Hunt was named its Communicator of Achievement in 1995.

Newly elected as NFPW first vice president is Marsha Shuler of Baton Rouge, La., a government reporter for The Advocate in Baton Rouge. Second vice president is Kathryn Cordova of El Prado, N.M., an author, freelance journalist, and an instructor at the Taos and Los Alamos branches of the University of New Mexico.

Secretary is Val Ensalaco of Chicago, Ill., corporate vice president for institutional advancement for the Franciscan Sisters of Chicago; and treasurer is Jackie Davis of Indianapolis, Ind., a freelance journalist and an adjunct professor at Butler University in Indianapolis.

The new officers were elected and installed at the 2005 NFPW communications conference in September in Seattle, Wash.

For 68 years, the National Federation of Press Women has promoted the highest ethical standards in communications; provided professional development, youth programs and networking; and advocated protection of First Amendment rights. NFPW is headquartered in Arlington, Va.
